Adonijah Hill's Journal Diary of a Philadelphia Reporter in 1876 James Smart

Meet Adonijah Hill, a 36-year-old Philadelphian, former textile mill worker, Civil War combat veteran, and reporter for the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin in the Centennial year, 1876. Adonijah never existed, but his daily journal, created with heavy research by well known Philadelphia writer James Smart, takes readers back to a time before automobiles, airplanes, telephones, radio, television, computers, skyscrapers, women's rights, and dozens of things we take for granted today. Steam engines and the telegraph were the major technologies, gas lights, outhouses and horse-drawn vehicles were the norm, dynamite was the dreaded weapon of mass destruction, and a typical work week was 60 hours.

Adonijah and those close to him are fictional, but all others mentioned by name in his journal were real, and the activities and events he describes really happened.

Lovers of a well written tale, of history, post-Civil War Philadelphia, journalism may love this book, written by the "In Our Town" iconic columnist of Philadelphia's Evening Bulletin, James Smart.
