After reading at the age of twelve The Count of Monte Cristo, David's greatest hope was to go to Marseille, France, and visit the remote island with its impregnable Chateau d'If, where his fictional hero was unjustly imprisoned. But it wasn't until he was passed fifty when he was able to travel to France.

Excerpt:

On the morning he had selected to buy the ticket to the Chateau d'If he walked excitedly through the streets of Marseille whose names he still remembered, toward the dock where the ship awaited for the tourists in line. He was anxious to get to the ticket office, worried that he might be left behind; pictures of the cell where his beloved hero had suffered for years crowded his thoughts; the iron bars through which he was fed daily; the contiguous cell, where Faria, the wise Abbé, the teacher who had taught languages, sciences and everything he knew to Edmund Dantés, including the exact location of the vast treasure that was well hidden in the Island of Monte Cristo. He felt his heart beating faster as he neared the ticket stand, from where he could see the ship that would finally fulfill his long-held aspirations.
